Chernobyl and Three Mile Island

Lessons for the Future

A Conference and Spacebridge

presented by Esalen Institute Soviet-American Exchange Program and Internews. Spacebridge also co-sponsored by the American Association for the Advancement of Science.

Thursday, September 11, 1986,
9 am to 5 pm; Registration 8 to 9 am
Doors will be closed 9 to 11 am
Lone Mountain Conference Center
University of San Francisco campus

The Program

A full-day conference featuring talks, panel discussions, and a television satellite spacebridge with Soviet,
American, and European scientists.

Spacebridge Participants (partial list)

Dr. Robert Gale, bone marrow transplant specialist who has been in the Soviet Union treating radiation victims.

Academician Yevgeny Velikhov, Vice President of the USSR Academy of Sciences and head of the investigation and clean-up of the Chernobyl reactor accident.

The Topics

- Comparative analysis of the Soviet and American nuclear programs.
- Ecological impact of the nuclear fuel cycle.
- Role of management and technology in minimizing nuclear accidents.
- International cooperation in prevention of and response to major nuclear accidents.

"Through the release of atomic energy, our generation has brought into the world the most revolutionary force since prehistoric man's discovery of fire . . . there is no possibility of control except through the aroused understanding and insistence of the peoples of the world."

—Albert Einstein, January 22, 1947

The recent partial meltdown at Chernobyl was the worst accident in the history of nuclear power. The serious accidents at Chernobyl and Three Mile Island show the urgent need for reliable information on the global implications of nuclear technology.

Chernobyl, along with previous accidents in the U.S. and Europe, provide an opportunity for non-adversarial discussion that is neither anti-nuclear nor anti-Soviet, but informational. In a spirit of openness and cooperation, the conference will bring together leading American, Soviet, and European scientists to discuss the risks of nuclear power generation, and the need for cooperation in developing adequate international controls and coping with potential accidents in the future.

Fees

$15 General admittance
$10 Senior citizens and students
Tickets will be available at the door.

U.S.-Soviet group to meet in city to discuss arms policy

Fifty Americans and 29 Soviets will meet next week in Minneapolis for a five-day conference on disarmament and arms limitation, sponsored by the Institute for Policy Studies in Washington, D.C., and by two Soviet groups.

The conference is an outgrowth of a session in Moscow last year involving Soviet officials and a U.S. delegation sent by the institute, a 20-year-old organization devoted to research on domestic and international issues.

The host for next week's session will be Minneapolis Mayor Don Fraser, who was part of the delegation to Moscow last year.

The conference will begin at 9:30 a.m. Tuesday and end with a breakfast on the following Sunday morning. Most sessions will be held at the Sheraton-Ritz Hotel and most will be closed to the public.

There will be two public sessions, however. One will be a panel discussion on "The Arms Race" at noon Wednesday (May 25) in the St. Paul Student Center at the University of Minnesota. The second will be a panel on U.S.-Soviet trade relations at 1:30 p.m. on Thursday (May 26) in the Nicollet Room of the Sheraton-Ritz.

The U.S. delegation will be led by Donald McHenry, former United States representative to the United Nations, and Marcus Raskin, co-founder and senior fellow at the Institute for Policy Studies.

Other members include William Sloane Coffin, pastor of Riverside Church in New York City; Hamilton Fish III, publisher of The Nation magazine; Terry Herndon, executive director of the National Education Association; Paul Warnke, former director of the U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency; Herbert Scoville, former assistant director of that agency and now president of the Arms Control Association; former Minnesota Gov. Al Quie, and Mark Dayton, 1982 DFL candidate for the U.S. Senate.

Among the Soviet delegates will be Nikolai Biobin, president of the USSR-USA Society, president of the U.S.S.R. Academy of Medical Sciences and deputy of the U.S.S.R. Supreme Soviet; Genrikh Trofimenko, head of the Institute of USA and Canada Studies; Aleksandr Astafiev, senior researcher of the Institute of World Economics and International Relations, and Alla Bobrisheva and Natalia Dolgoplova, both senior research fellows of the Institute of U.S. and Canada Studies.

The Russians are coming

Protesters picketed Minneapolis City Hall Friday morning and again in the afternoon to oppose a Soviet-American disarmament conference in the city next week and to protest Mayor Don Fraser's involvement. "With the Soviets in Afghanistan and with trouble in Poland, it seems the wrong time to have them over here," said Keith Johnson of Bloomington, chairman of the Minnesota Patriotic Coalition, which organized the protest. Fraser, who went to Moscow for a similar conference last year, is the host of the conference, which will involve 50 Americans and 29 Russians in talks on disarmament and arms limitation. Fraser was out of the city yesterday and thus unavailable for comment, his aide Eric Colborn said.

Private talks on U.S.-Soviet topics set

Thirty Russians and 50 Americans begin a round of private talks on U.S.-Soviet relations, nuclear disarmament and other world topics today in Minneapolis.

Sponsored by the Institute for Policy Studies in Washington, D.C., and two Soviet groups, the conference at the Sheraton-Ritz Hotel is an offshoot of a similar session held last year in Moscow.

Minneapolis Mayor Donald Fraser is host for the conference. He was a member of the American delegation sponsored by the institute.

Nancy MacGibbon, spokeswoman for an organization known as Grass Roots for A Strong, Secure America, said the group will protest the conference.

She said the organization will picket a dinner for the conferees at 6 p.m. today at the IDS Center, Minneapolis, and also will demonstrate at a panel discussion on U.S.-Soviet relations at noon Wednesday at the North Star Room of the St. Paul Student Center on the University of Minnesota's St. Paul campus.

Other protests are planned during sessions at the Sheraton Ritz on Thursday and at the state Capitol on Saturday, she said.

According to literature distributed by MacGibbon, the group favors a strong national defense, and is opposed to nuclear disarmament.

The discussion at noon Wednesday is one of two conference sessions that are open to the public. The other is a review of U.S.-Soviet trade that will begin at 3:30 p.m. Thursday at the Sheraton Ritz.

American participants include Donald McHenry, former U.S. representative to the United Nations; Terry Herndon, executive director of the National Education Association, and Paul Warnke, former director of the U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency.

Soviet participants include academics, clergymen, political and factory workers, scientists, doctors and industry officials.

U.S.-Soviet peace forum opens in Minneapolis

Soviets willing to discuss arms curbs but not human rights issues

About 60 Americans and Soviets got together Tuesday in Minneapolis to talk about problems confronting their two countries, but they had a difficult time deciding which problems to talk about.

Soviet delegates to the privately sponsored conference said they wanted to focus on the need for arms control and nuclear disarmament.

Several of the American delegates said that wasn't enough, that the discussions should include human rights and the treatment of political dissidents in the Soviet Union.

The disagreement wasn't resolved — and that may set the tone for the public portions of the four-day conference, organized by the Institute for Policy Studies, a research group with strong liberal leanings that is based in Washington, D.C. One such session will be held today.

The Reagan administration is not represented at the discussions.

"They wouldn't have come if we'd asked them," said Richard Barnet, an institute founder and a former visiting professor at Macalester College in St. Paul.

Two of the Soviet delegates to the talks were denied visas by the U.S. State Department, Barnet said. One is a researcher for the Soviet Academy of Science, the other a department head within the bureaucracy of the Central Committee of the Communist Party.

None of the 26 Soviet delegates got the U.S. government's permission to come until last weekend, although the conference has been planned for months, Barnet added.

Delegates from both countries said that relations between the two countries have deteriorated. "Cooperation is almost to the point of zero," said Genrikh Trofimenko, who is head of the U.S. and Canada Studies Institute in the Soviet Union.

There was agreement that trust must be built between the two peoples if the nuclear arms race is to be stopped and such weapons eventually eliminated. But there was sharp disagreement on how to go about building that trust.

Several Soviet speakers said there is need for a return to serious talks on disarmament. Trofimenko argued for a step-by-step approach, saying that the United States had never shown any interest in the past in making broad, wide-ranging agreements on nuclear weapons and testing.

Patricia Derian, who was State Department human rights director in the Carter administration, said arms control must be linked to the human rights issue. She called the lack of human rights in the Soviet Union the "chief impediment" to creating trust and understanding.

"Every American knows that a Russian will lose his job if he applies to leave the Soviet Union, and you've got to deal with that if you're going to change attitudes in this country," she said.

Jerome Grossman saw the issue in slightly different terms. He is president of the Council for a Liveable World and described himself as a long-time worker in the nuclear freeze and peace movements.

"Human rights violations in the Soviet Union close the minds of millions of Americans to our message of survival," he said. "Nothing would help us more (in the peace movement) than progress in such cases as (Andrei) Sakharov and (Anatoly) Shcharansky."

The mention of Sakharov brought a sharp rebuttal from the head of the Soviet delegation, Nikolai Bolshin. He commented that America's record on human rights is less than perfect and then said that Sakharov, a well-known physicist who has criticized his government on the rights issue, would be jailed if he lived in America.

Bolshin's comments brought an equally sharp rebuttal from Bob Kaiser, a former Moscow correspondent for the Washington Post. He said that he knew Sakharov and that Bolshin's statements were "foolish."

Despite the verbal jousting, Kaiser said later in an interview that the conference is worthwhile. "It's important to keep talking on any level," he said, "especially when relations are so bad between the two governments."

"You don't expect them (the Soviets) to react any differently than they did today. After all, they will be held accountable for what they say by their government. But at sessions like these, contacts are made and ideas are exchanged that might be useful."

The conference is the outgrowth of talks between a 10-member delegation that went to Moscow last year to discuss U.S.-Soviet relations.

One of today's sessions will be open to the public: A panel discussion sponsored by the University of Minnesota's Hubert Humphrey Institute of Public Affairs from noon until 1:30 p.m. at the student union on the St. Paul campus.

Visiting Soviets bombarbed at arms forum

The Minneapolis conference on Soviet-American relations met in public today to steer the audience's quest for the first time Wednesday, and lions back to the intended theme—the visiting delegates were bombarded. “We all live in the same world. What is the most important question facing the world today?”

The bombardment was so heavy—Before Adams could supply her own one questioner called the Soviets answer—“war or peace”—a woman “propagandists or liars and hypo- yelled from the back of the room, crites”—that official apologies were “freedom.” Another said, “liberty,” made later.

The public forum at the student center on the University of Minnesota's St. Paul campus was supposed to be a panel discussion centering on arms control and nuclear disarmament.

But many in the audience identified themselves as immigrants from the Soviet Union or other East bloc countries, they came to attack.

They claimed that millions died in the Ukraine in the 1930s because of Soviet policies, that Jews are not free to leave the country or to worship, that political dissidents are physically abused.

They said that Soviet citizens are harassed because of their political and religious beliefs, that Soviet troops are killing innocent people in Afghanistan, that the Soviets can't be trusted to live up to international agreements.

The three Soviet panelists tried to fend off the allegations calmly, but eventually their comments got sharp, too.

“We have questions for you, too,” Vitaly Kobyshev said. “The world hasn't forgotten that you came to Indochina and millions were killed. Then you came out and said you made a mistake.”

Kobyshev said later that he was “sure” that some of the protesters were Nazis.

“We came here (to America) to struggle for mutual understanding. But looking into some of those faces in the audience ... well ... they simply wanted to get at (our) throats.”

The moderator, Harrison Salisbury, also tried to modulate the emotionalism by limiting questions from the audience. But the forum was being filmed by KTCA-TV and a director kept holding up cards instructing Salisbury to go to the audience for questions.

Salisbury, a University of Minnesota graduate who won a Pulitzer Prize for his reporting from Moscow after World War II for The New York Times, complied with the instructions. The 90-minute program will be aired tonight on Channel 2.

After the conference resumed in the afternoon, several American delegates apologized to the Soviet delegates.

Minneapolis Mayor Don Fraser, who is a delegate, said he regretted that the scheduled topic was largely ignored, but added that such expressions of “honest, strong convictions” are a reality of American political life.

The approximately 60 delegates, including 26 Soviets, did eventually return to the topic at hand. But they didn't reach any agreement on possible ways to help stop the nuclear-arms race.

Soviet speakers said that the Reagan administration doesn't appear to be serious about negotiating arms limitations. Several American delegates agreed.

The Americans, who are active in the nuclear-freeze and peace movements, did suggest that a modest Soviet reduction in missiles might strengthen the freeze movement in this country and in western Europe.

Randall Forsberg, the founder of the freeze movement, proposed the removal of some of the 250 Soviet SS4 and SS5 missiles facing western Europe. “The Soviet Union wouldn't be losing anything,” she said, “because it was replacing those with SS20s when we started talking about putting Pershing and cruise missiles in Europe.”

Armed with that unilateral action by the Soviets, Forsberg said the freeze movement would then bring pressure on Congress and the administration to delay the deployment of the Pershing and cruise missiles while disarmament talks continue.

The pressure would come from bringing many Europeans to Washington, D.C., to explain their objections to the new missiles to Congress and the nation.

Forsberg said there would also be an effort to inundate Congress with letters, phone calls and lobbyists working to stop the scheduled buildup in arms in Europe.

Several Soviet delegates said that such a buildup will start a new round in the arms race, but they said they didn't like the idea of a unilateral reduction.

However, a few did privately indicate an interest in the proposal. “We've been told that they are going to take Randy's idea and others like it back to Moscow for consideration,” Cora Weiss said. “Of course, that doesn't mean they'll decide to do it.” Weiss was a national leader in the anti-Vietnam-war movement.

The conference, which will continue through Saturday, was organized by the Institute for Policy Studies, a self-styled “left-leaning think tank” based in Washington, D.C.

No representatives of the Reagan administration are attending the conference, which is being held in Minneapolis at the invitation of Mayor Fraser.

Audience sets tone at U.S.-Soviet discussion

By James Nelson

About half an hour into a panel discussion on U.S.-Soviet Union relations at the St. Paul campus Wednesday, Ruth Adams made her second appeal to the audience to get off the subject of human rights and onto the subject of arms control.

"I'm beginning to wonder if we all live in the same world," said Adams, editor of the Bulletin of Atomic Scientists. While the issue of human rights is certainly important and worth discussion, she said, the real issue for the audience of about 500 and the distinguished Americans and Soviets who took the stage in the North Star Ballroom at the St. Paul Student Center "is peace and war."

Adams' plea fell mainly on deaf ears, however, both underscoring the problems facing U.S.-Soviet relations and highlighting how human rights and the arms race are, at least in many American minds, inextricably linked to one another.

The public forum bringing the Americans and Soviets together was part of a week-long round of talks taking place in the Twin Cities and was to address three main areas of contention—U.S.-Soviet relations in general, arms control negotiations, and the future of U.S.-Soviet relations.

On the American side of the podium was Marcus Raskin, co-founder of the Institute for Policy Studies, a liberal think tank; Adams; and University political science professor and former defense analyst Bruce Berkowitz. On the Soviet side of moderator Harrison Salisbury sat Vitaly Kobyshev from the Central Committee of the Soviet Union's Communist Party; Genrikh Trofimchenko, head of the U.S. and Canada Studies Institute and member of the Soviet Peace Committee; and Mikhail Milshtein, also of the U.S. and Canada Studies Institute, member of the Soviet Peace Committee and Ph.D. in political military sciences.

And in the audience were many concerned Americans and angry Soviet emigrants to the United States, many of them Jewish, who held a peaceful sign-carrying demonstration outside before the discussion began. The audience pitched a number of provocative questions and statements to the Soviet dignitaries.

First up was a woman imploring the Soviets to let Soviet Premier Yuri Andropov know of American's concern for the fate of Andrei Sakharov, an exiled Jewish dissident. Next came a question setting the tone for the remaining discussion: how can Americans believe the Soviets will honor a nuclear weapons treaty when they have violated the Helsinki Accords regarding human rights and have prevented Jews from emigrating?

Said the Soviet Union's Kobyshev to a hail of catcalls and grumbling from the crowd: "I would say that Mr. Sakharov was very well treated in Gorki (where he is in internal exile)."

Said Trofimchenko to another round of boos: "I don't see that we are violating the Helsinki accord." And on emigration: "I think anyone who wants to emigrate can emigrate from the Soviet Union."

So it went until Adams made her first plea. "We are here today as members of the human race," she said, adding that despite differences, the bottom line is that both countries face nuclear annihilation and should address that danger.

But the human race was having none of that. Said Trofimchenko, "Human rights is not boiling down to whether you can emigrate or not emigrate. Those people who are really concerned about human rights in my country stay in my country."

"I think it's the people's business to do what they do inside their own country," he added. "It's for the people of a country to work for improvement of society."

Said Marcus Raskin, almost unnecessarily: "I think what we will find is our real differences are very great."

The biggest difference, of course, is trust. "Right now we trust nuclear weapons" to keep the peace, instead of believing in the aims of the other country, Raskin said. Both countries could "get out of the bag we're in" by looking into the eyes of the enemy.

"I would take exception to what my friend Mr. Raskin would say," said Trofimchenko. "We do not look at the United States as an enemy. We want to be on really friendly terms with the Americans and work with them."

Working with the Americans on a nuclear freeze or SALT II-type treaty would involve opening the Soviet Union to some degree for on-site weapons inspection, a questioner noted. Is the Soviet Union ready to do that?

Milshtein said the Soviets are ready to do just that, while Raskin noted the Soviets had hedged on verification before because they were afraid the West would find them weaker than they appeared. Now, said Raskin, "as far as I can tell," the Soviets are stronger militarily and probably would agree to on-site inspection.

Toward the end of the lively dialogue, Raskin noted "the integral relationship that human rights have to the arms race." Human rights, the bone of contention that most of the audience brought to the affair, will improve "only to the extent that the arms race ends," Raskin said, because the issue is tied to a nation's concern for national security.

Although the discussion wasn't intended to solve anything, it did give both sides a chance to air their opinions. A future conference might be held in the Soviet Union, and could give the Soviet people the chance to take a few shots at American dignitaries. After all, said Kobyshev, "We have plenty of questions in our country, too."

American and Soviet delegates to the U.S./U.S.S.R. Bilateral Exchange Conference agreed on a bland concluding statement Saturday after three Soviets reacted angrily to a question about peace groups suppressed by their government.

The statement was issued at the conclusion of the six-day conference at the Sheraton-Ritz Hotel devoted to discussions of how to prevent nuclear war. The statement said proposals had been made on verifying a bilateral freeze on nuclear weapons, initiatives that might be taken by either country, and a pledge that neither country would use nuclear weapons first.

"There were differences on these issues among the attendees," the statement said. "However, the participants were unanimous in their conviction that the hour is late; that the danger of global destruction grows, and with it the urgency of finding new ways to break the impasse and reverse the arms race."

About 50 anti-Soviet demonstrators held a rally on the state capitol steps after failing to confront conference delegates who had entered by a side door for a tour of the capitol and dinner with Gov. Rudy Perpich and legislative leaders late yesterday afternoon.

Yesterday morning, cochairman Marcus Raskin, senior fellow at the Institute for Policy Studies in Washington, said he was asking "in a friendly, frank way" why peace groups not approved by the Soviet government were not allowed to operate. It would be advantageous to have a Soviet peace group that criticizes its own government, he said.

Vikenty Matveev, a political columnist for the government newspaper Izvestia, replied that millions of Soviet citizens belong to "hundreds and thousands" of local peace groups that were set up independently. He said only a dozen youths belonged to a recently suppressed peace group, that they only wanted publicity in the West and that most have emigrated to Israel.

Their names have been forgotten in the U.S.S.R., he said. "They cease, so to speak, to exist." A few such people don't constitute a movement, he said, and they are not serious enough to deserve such attention.

Nodari Simoniya, doctor of history at the U.S.S.R. Academy of Sciences, added through a translator that the Soviet Union doesn't have a government like that of President Reagan, "which is against peace." Soviet peace groups are independent, he insisted, but nothing would bring them to oppose the Soviet government.

Alexander Shvets, professor of English language studies, said anti-Soviet protesters who picketed some of the meetings also tried to represent themselves as a movement. In fact, he said, there were few of them, they are emigrants who continue to have negative feelings about the Soviet Union, and they want to interfere with attempts to bring about peace.

Three Soviet delegates who appeared at the final press conference were baited by two men who identified themselves as reporters for a specialized "intelligence" magazine and a syndicated news service. Raskin said they had not asked questions, and he refused to allow responses.

Raskin and the other cochairman, Donald McHenry, former U.S. chief delegate to the United Nations, said delegates had not reached agreement on how to verify disarmament. But the position of the U.S. government has changed over the years, a recently suppressed peace group, said Raskin, so it may be possible to develop a nuclear freeze, then move on to general disarmament.

A group of six or eight American experts and the same number of Soviets will have joint discussions in the months ahead to prepare for the next meeting of the conference next year in Moscow.

In summarizing a group discussion Friday, Gennady Gerasimov, a Soviet political columnist, said a special danger is created by new arms technology. There is no point in developing antiballistic missiles and antisubmarine weapons, he said, because they only create an illusion that a country can protect itself against nuclear attack.

Gennik Trofimenko, head of the department of U.S. and Canada Studies at the U.S.S.R. Academy of Sciences, said another group had agreed that it was necessary to retain the present balance of nuclear arms. Americans in the group had supported the Soviet renunciation of a first nuclear strike, he said, and agreed that NATO should make a similar pledge.

After two Soviet journalists said the Soviet press gives an objective view of the United States while the American press is biased against the U.S.S.R., Minneapolis Mayor Don Fraser said the conference could not solve such fundamental differences as the role of the press. But, he added, such differences may have to be accepted or they could prevent an agreement.

Peace Comes to Minneapolis

The nuclear-freeze movement gets a pretty smooth ride as it travels around the country with its mom-and-apple pie routine. We recall, for instance, the warm, grass-roots feeling created last year when the villagers of Weston, Vt., passed a nuclear freeze resolution. In large part, the freeze movement is an idea that comes out of what might be called the John Lennon school of foreign policy: All we are saying is give peace a chance. Who could be against that?

The freeze movement found out who could be against that kind of flimsy thinking in Minneapolis last week. A delegation of 25 Soviet scholars and government officials and 30 Americans had gathered there to discuss nuclear disarmament at the invitation of Minneapolis Mayor Don Fraser. The Americans included President Carter's former ambassador to the U.N., Donald McHenry; Randall Forsberg, founder of the freeze movement itself, and Cora Weiss, who speaks often on behalf of "peace."

The symposium was sponsored by the Institute for Policy Studies of Washington, D.C., described in press reports as a "left-leaning think tank." IPS is indeed left-leaning, but to identify any American who leans further to the left would require naming individuals few readers have heard of.

This convocation of Soviet and American citizens for peace was not long under way when it ran smack into the one group of people it should most want to avoid—recent immigrants to the U.S. from the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe. One questioner in the audience called the panelists "propagandists or liars and hypocrites." Others in attendance voiced their bill of particulars: The Soviet Union harasses its citizens for their religious beliefs; its army is killing innocent people in Afghanistan; its policies caused the death of millions in the Ukraine in the 1930s; Jews are no longer allowed to leave Russia, and we can't trust the Soviets to honor their international agreements.

Harrison Salisbury, a journalist who was moderating, tried to limit questions from the audience. He failed. Ruth Adams, an American, asked, "What is the most important question facing the world today?" Someone shouted "freedom." Someone else shouted "liberty." The American delegates later issued a formal apology to their guests from the Soviet Union.

In a "joint communique" last Saturday, the peace-conference delegates in Minneapolis announced formation of a joint study group to further pursue the issue of disarmament and to make plans for a similar conference in 1984. It will be held in Moscow, where, unlike in Minneapolis, one can discuss peace without apology.

Yeltsin: Soviets can learn from America

By Verena Dobnik
The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Maverick Soviet politician Boris N. Yeltsin said Sunday that his country faces continuing economic and social decline and can learn from American democracy while changing its political system.

"We are in an economic and financial and social crisis, as well as in respect to the (Communist) party," Yeltsin said on CBS News' "Face the Nation."

Yeltsin arrived Saturday to begin his first visit to the United States, a two-week tour that includes stops throughout the country.

Yeltsin will speak at the American Center for International Leadership's annual dinner in Indianapolis Thursday.

"We have to take what is positive from Soviet experience and what has been positive in the experience of the other socialist countries, positive from America's more than 200 years of democratic experience — and on the basis of that create a new model of socialism," Yeltsin said through a translator.

"We do need a new model of socialism, yes," he said. "We have to stop being so dogmatic as we were before."

"The whole society is in a crisis and such extraordinary measures of an economic or financial nature are obviously necessary since the standard recently not only has not risen but has, actually fallen," he said.

Yeltsin, 58, lost his position as Moscow's Communist Party chief in 1987 after criticizing the slow pace of change under Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev. But this year he was overwhelmingly elected to the Soviet Congress.

Gorbachev, he said, "missed some opportunities to accelerate perestroika."

"Naturally, there has started a movement from below in the form of strikes indicating dissatisfaction with the national leadership, including with Mr. Gorbachev," Yeltsin said.

"If the situation gets worse, and I think it is going to, his popularity and authority will doubtless continue to decline."

However, Yeltsin said he believes Gorbachev "did a lot about the democratization of the country" and that he "will indeed retain his position as leader."

He also said he does not reject the idea of creating a new, multi-party system in the Soviet Union.

"But this question has got to be discussed by the population first, and when the public opinion has matured to that point, then we can decide that issue."

Through an intermediary, Yeltsin sent word earlier this year to the Leigh Bureau, a speakers agency based in Princeton, N.J., that he was interested in coming to the United States. He has said he will donate his fees to a Soviet fund to fight AIDS.

dience about his conversation earlier this week with President George Bush.

In the meeting, Yeltsin suggested both countries could benefit from U.S. interest and assistance.

In particular, Yeltsin said he told Bush he wanted the United States to grant the Soviet Union most-favored-nation status.

In return, the Soviet Union would change its emigration policy and allow more citizens to leave the country, he said.

Yeltsin also said he hopes the Soviet Union will change its private property laws to allow at least 10 to 15 percent of the country's economy to be in the hands of private individuals.

Although Yeltsin said he did not ask Bush for help in the form of grants to the Soviet Union, he said he hoped American businesses would invest in the Soviet Union.

He added that he looks forward to the day when the Soviet Union will allow direct investment in his country.

Earlier Thursday, Yeltsin stopped to chat with hog farmer John Hardin Jr. and to tour his farm outside of Danville, Ind., which is about 25 miles west of Indianapolis.

After arriving in Indianapolis, Yeltsin was eager to begin a tour of Hardin's farm, declining to give a news conference to the more than 30 members of the media.

Yeltsin asked Hardin questions about American food production during the tour.

"Do you raise enough corn for (feed) or do you have to buy more?" Yeltsin asked. The farm produces twice as much as his pigs need, and he sells the extra, Hardin said.

Yeltsin also detailed some of the differences between Soviet and American markets.

"The retail price (of pork) in the Soviet Union is half the wholesale price in the United States," Yeltsin told Hardin through an interpreter.

"We sell it for half what it costs to produce it," he said.

Also Thursday, Yeltsin visited former President Ronald Reagan at a Minnesota hospital and met with Gov. Evan Bayh in the governor's Statehouse office.

Yeltsin's visit to Indiana was sponsored by the American Center for International Leadership, a Columbus, Ind.-based, non-profit organization that offers leadership training for government, business and education managers.

Yeltsin to visit hog farm, governor

Soviet political maverick Boris N. Yeltsin will inspect a Hoosier hog farm and meet the governor during his visit to Indiana today.

Yeltsin, 58, also will talk about the future of democracy in the Soviet Union at a fund-raising dinner during his seven-hour stay.

John Hardin Jr.'s hog farm in Danville will be Yeltsin's first stop. Hardin, vice president of the National Pork Producers Council, has a 1,200-acre farm in Hendricks County. He sends 6,000 hogs to market each year.

Yeltsin

"He asked to go to a farm," said Thomas J. Henry, vice president for development of the American Center for International Leadership, which is sponsoring the visit.

"He wants to see one in operation, and he asked for a state-of-the-art farm so he could take a look at how things are done. The difference in American agriculture and Soviet agriculture is enormous in terms of productivity and cost-effectiveness and he wanted to see it in action," Henry said.

The center, based in Columbus, is a non-partisan, not-for-profit organization that offers leadership training for middle-management people in government, business, education and other areas throughout the world.

After the 40-minute farm tour, Yeltsin will return to Indianapolis for a 30-minute meeting with Gov. Evan Bayh.

Yeltsin, a former Communist Party chief in Moscow, is on a private, unofficial visit to the United States. He was invited by the American-Soviet exchange program of the Esalen Institute in San Francisco.

Yeltsin, one of the more outspoken critics of Soviet President Mikhail S. Gorbachev, was elected in March to the Congress of People's Deputies. He has criticized Gorbachev for being too slow in implementing perestroika (economic reform) and glasnost (openness).

Gorbachev ousted Yeltsin two years ago from the Politburo because of a speech he made that accused the Soviet president of building a "cult of personality."

Henry said at least 450 people will attend a dinner tonight at the Westin Hotel to hear Yeltsin speak. While in the United States, Yeltsin is raising money for AIDS research in the Soviet Union.

Politician from USSR to meet with Bayh

By The Associated Press
INDIANAPOLIS — Outspoken Soviet politician Boris Yeltsin will call on Gov. Evan Bayh today and speak in Indianapolis at the annual dinner of the American Center for International Leadership tonight.

Not all Hoosiers are happy he will be here, however, according to the group sponsoring his visit.

The ACLI, a not-for-profit organization based in Columbus, Ind., has received about 20 letters and calls of protest, says Tom Henry, the group's vice president for development.

There are still a lot of people who think all Communists are the same — to use the old expression — and they don't recognize the wing of the government over there that Yeltsin is a part of," said Henry.

"Thirty-five years ago, he would have been shot for what he's doing now."

So far on a 10-day U.S. tour, Yeltsin has called for free Soviet emigration, an end to nuclear testing and the rapid advancement of Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev's promised reforms.

The event is set for 7 p.m. at the Westin Hotel. Dinner tickets cost $60 each. Tables of 10 are available for $500. Reception tickets are an additional $100.

Yeltsin urges U.S. to rescue reform

By Michelle Kury

Indiana Daily Student

INDIANAPOLIS — Under the stars of the Indiana State Fair, Yeltsin addressed a large audience Thursday, he hopes the United States will help the Soviet Union rescue perestroika.

Yeltsin, the Soviet Union's most visible critic of Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev, spoke at the American Center for International Leadership's annual dinner on the sixth day of a United States tour.

Through an interpreter, Yeltsin said the Soviet Union is in terrible condition, but four years after the initiation of perestroika, the Russian team for the current reform movement, Mark Gromov, is still below the poverty level, he said.

When the policy of perestroika began four years ago, the country made great progress, especially because of the new democratic structure, he said.

But because the pace of reforms has been so slow since then, Yeltsin said he believes a revolution of the people might occur soon.

"Today perestroika is in a standstill, and we are very close to a major disaster," Yeltsin said.

He said he thinks U.S. citizens want to see the Soviet Union become a democracy.

The visit, Yeltsin's first to the United States, tops off his comeback in Soviet politics.

In 1987, Yeltsin, now 38, was ousted from his position as leader of Moscow's Communist Party after he criticized the slow pace of reform under Gorbachev.

But in a dramatic political comeback, Yeltsin was elected in March to the Soviet parliament with 90 percent of the vote. He now leads the most radical bloc in the parliament.

Yeltsin told the Indianapolis audience.
